Unit Set Up For The First Time For All Of Judaism To Seek Converts

For the first time in the history of Judaism a broadly representative organization has been incorporated for the specific purpose of propagating that faith. Known as the Jewish Information Society, the new body is composed of prominent laymen and clergymen. All three branches of American Judaism — Reform, Orthodox, and Conservative — are represented on the society's governing board. Its headquarters is in Chicago.

Establishment of the organization constitutes a departure from traditional Judaism, which has not considered itself a missionary faith since the pre-Christian era, says the New York Times. On occasion, individual Jewish leaders have publicly proposed that their faith enter the search for new adherents. But never before has such an inclusive organization been formed for that purpose. The society is confined to the Chicago area, but it is expected that branches or chapters will be opened in other cities.

The preamble to the body's constitution reads as follows:

"The purposes of the society are the propagation and dissemination by means of lectures, pamphlets, books and by such other means as may be deemed suitable of the views of God, man, and the world set forth in the basic tenets of Judaism and expanded and explained in the Hebrew Bible and in the Jewish tradition and to unite all the people of the world in a commitment to the one Universal God and the Brotherhood of Man."

The society will receive support from voluntary contributions. Establishment of the group was disclosed by one of its officials. He said that individuals attracted to Judaism through the efforts of the society would be referred to the branch that appeals to them.

Ben MacCabbee, head of a Chicago engineering firm, is president of the society. Co-chairmen are Rabbis Ralph Simon, Conservative; Gunther Plaut, Reform; and Aaron Ring, Orthodox. The three vice-presidents are Rabbis Sholom Singer, Reform; Philip Lipis, Conservative; and David Graubart, Conservative.

Rabbi Singer predicted that the society would eventually place Judaism alongside Roman Catholicism and Protestantism as a third major missionary force. Disclosure of the formation of the new society was made during the annual meeting at Bretton Woods, N. H., of the Central Conference of American Rabbis, in the Mount Washington Hotel.

The rabbis were told that philanthropic support of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations and the Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion had more than doubled in the last decade, says the New York Times.

Irving S. Schneider, executive vice chairman of the Combined Campaigns for American Reform Judaism, said gifts this year had exceeded $2,200,000. Ten years ago they barely amounted to $1 million. The ten-year total amounted to $15,600,000.

Whole Congregation Is Moving To Green Fields To Escape Slums

In a mass migration reminded of times long past, an entire Jewish congregation of 1,260 families is preparing to move from its slum-bound area in Williamsburg, Brooklyn, N. Y., to a new life fifty miles northwest in the green fields of Sussex County, N. Y. In Sussex, it was disclosed, the Orthodox Congregation Yetyev Lev d'Satmar has purchased 200 acres, plans to add another 300 acres, and will found a new community there, eventually to have its own schools, water, business life, and everything.

Jacob Worcberger, vice-president of the congregation, explained to the New York Herald Tribune in Williamsburg why he and his group — the largest Chasidic congregation in the United States — want to move to their new land straddling the border between Franklin and Hardyston Townships in Jersey's most northwest county.

The Williamsburg area is running down, he said, headed for a slum status. The folk of the congregation — about 850 families actually live in Williamsburg while the others are scattered but still belong — fear they will become widely separated and lose their identity.

Some new housing, he said, in tall structures is coming into Williamsburg to replace slum areas, but that could pose awkward problems for the congregation, which is a very strict one. For example, on the Sabbath, which is Saturday, the day is spent in rest and prayer and no use of gas or electricity is permitted

Was A Top N.Y. Play Producer For Over 20 Years

Arch Selwyn, Broadway producer of the Nineteen Twenties and co-founder of the Goldwyn Pictures Corporation, which became Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, died in Hollywood, Cal., at a private sanitarium after a year-long illness. He was 82 years old. He leaves a son, William E. Selwyn, one of Hollywood's leading casting directors, of Los Altos; and two daughters, Mrs. Anna S. Isaacs, of Los Angeles; and Mrs. Rae S. Goldsmith, of New York.

Mr. Selwyn, a leading Broadway play producer for more than twenty years, had held such unprepossessing jobs as errand boy, bellhop, usher, and laundry operator. After a variety of small jobs in the theatre, he worked as an assistant in the box office of the old Herald Square Theatre in New York.

Mr. Selwyn went to the U.S. as a child from his native Toronto, Canada, and lived in Selma, Ala., until he was able to go to New York near the turn of the century on funds earned by his older brother, Edgar, as an usher in the old Herald Square Theater.

When the Spanish-American War began, he quit to join the Seventy-first New York Regiment, with which he served in Cuba. After the war, he started a laundry in Cuba, but was literally blown out of business by a hurricane.

He returned to New York and started a laundry. He had only a two-wheel cart for collections and deliveries, while his competitor, Sam Harris, who later also became a producer, had a horse and wagon. Discouraged by this handicap, Mr. Selwyn, with his late brother Edgar, entered the ~~play-brokerage~~ business. He opened an office in the Childs Building.

Among the Selwyns' clients was Henry Arthur Jones, English dramatist. The business was merged later with that of Elisabeth Marbury and John Ramsay, forming the American Play Company. Bayard Veiller's play, "Within the Law," led the Selwyns into the managerial side of the theatre. They sold the play to five producers. Only William A. Brady had enough faith in it to present it. He put it on in Chicago, but

Deplores Parent "Ignorance Of Jewish Heritage"

Most Jewish parents in the U.S. are ignorant of their religious heritage, Dr. Judah Pilch, executive director of the American Association for Jewish Education, said in a report issued at the fourth national conference on Jewish education in New York. He urged "a systematic and effective program of Jewish education for Jewish parents and adults", says the New York Times. More than 650 educators and other persons attended the association-sponsored conference at the Roosevelt Hotel.

"Unless we engage in such a program of education for parents and adults," Dr. Pilch declared, "much of our work in the Jewish religious schools has little significance. We bend every effort in providing our children with the best possible Jewish education while the parents themselves, except for a minority, are ignorant of the Jewish heritage. To bridge this gap is the task of adult Jewish education."

At a dinner meeting the association celebrated its twentieth anniversary. The Association, which has headquarters at 1261 Broadway, is a central co-ordinating agency serving the Jewish educational needs of all ideological groups in the American Jewish community. In a tribute to the association Dr. Horace M. Kallen, educator and philosopher, declared that it "has awakened American Jewish schooling to the principles and practices of democracy, and their necessary place in the idea of Jewish education."

In an address Dr. George D. Stodard, dean of the School of Education of New York University, said that "the hope for the future is not in man as an animal

Israelis Angered Over Sale Of Arms Made There To West Germany

At Bonn, West Germany, the Defense Ministry confirmed that it signed a contract last March for about $3,000,000 worth of mortar ammunition from an Israeli arms manufacturer, Soltam, Ltd., of Haifa. Premier David Ben-Gurion was faced with new political difficulties over the sale of Israeli-made arms to West Germany, says the New York Times. Two parties in his coalition Government have denounced the transaction. The Premier was attacked by spokesmen for most of the other parties represented in the Knesset (Parliament).

In March, it was reported, Israel contracted to sell 250,000 grenade launchers to the West German Government. These devices fit on the muzzle of a service rifle and project an anti-tank grenade when the rifle is fired. The contract totals £6,000,000 Israeli ($3,300,000).

The details of the sale were not known in Israel until June 25 when two newspapers reprinted an article from the West Germany weekly, Der Spiegel, describing the transaction. The dispute is not over the fact that arms manufactured in Israel are being sold abroad. Israel has made several arms deals, including the sale of submachine guns to several countries of the North Atlantic pact.

This was the first time, however, that Israeli arms had been offered for sale to Germany, where hundreds of thousands of Jews were put to death when the Nazis were in power. With general elections scheduled to be held in Israel in November, the arms sale has quickly developed into a major political issue.

A majority of Israel's newspapers, most of which are owned by the political parties, published editorials criticizing the Ben-Gurion Government for the West German contract. Haaretz, an influential independent daily, pointed out that Israel received millions of dollars annually in reparations from West Germany.

"But this does not affect the reserve in regard to relations with Germany," the paper declared. "If we approve the arms deal in question it must be clear to us that we have passed the border line and we must ask if the hour is really ripe, fourteen years after the end of the second world war, for the Zionist, Jewish state of Israel to appear before the world as a friend of a German State."

Mr. Ben-Gurion told Davar, the journal of Histadrut, the Israel Labor Federation, that the arms sale to Germany had been discussed along with other pending transactions by a Knesset committee last December, says the New York Times. He contended that no objections had been raised then.

Exile Attains Highest Average In 112 Years Of N.Y.C.C.

A man who twice escaped from Soviet troops and once fled a German concentration camp dressed as a Nazi soldier was graduated summa cum laude from City College in New York. Gil C. AlRoy, now 30 years old, completed his college training at City College with a straight "A" average in thirty-three courses. He was the first student to attain this average in the 112-year history of the College.

A native of Czernowitz, Rumania, Mr. AlRoy enrolled in a school established there by Soviet authorities when the Russians occupied the city in 1940, says the New York Times. He fled when other members of his family were rounded up and sent to the Soviet Union for forced labor. But she was captured by the Germans.

Mr. AlRoy's fluency in German — he also speaks Russian, French, English, Ukranian, Italian, Hebrew and Bulgarian, in addition to English and his native tongue — led a German officer to befriend him and give him the uniform to flee Doaga Camp. He also escaped from two other camps. Then he evaded Russian troops who returned in 1944.

Later he went to Israel, posting as a Hungarian refugee, fought in the Israeli Army from 1948 to 1950 and was re-united with his family.

Zalman Schneour, Hebrew And Yiddish Poet Of A Great Epoch

BY ITZHAK IVRY

Literary historians of the Hebrew renaissance period have classified Zalman Schneour as one of the Big Three in Hebrew poetry, together with Bialik and Tchernichovsky. Although the three poets were basically different in talents, inclinations, and creative patterns, it may rightly be said that Bialik's and Tchernichovsky's demise, Schneour felt like the last Mohican. A poet with a great sense of pride, he felt lonely when his greatest competitors left the stage.

In moments of quiet reflection the poet must have said: Give me back the bright and shining moments of Odessa, Warsaw, Vilno, and Berlin, not because he yearned for these strange and desolate towns whose Jewish population has since been decimated and their cultural monuments destroyed, but because these moments meant a period of ascendency, a period of novel and memorable creativity, not only for him but also for his close friends. One of them was Bialik, whom Schneour unreservedly admired. It was Bialik who first declared in his famous essay "Our Young Poetry": "And here is Schneour, a young Samson, whose all seven braids grew over night, a young lion . . ." This was Bialik's immediate reaction to Schneour's first poems of youth, and this remained very dear to Schneour's heart.

Schneour, a man of keen psychological insight, knew well, when he reached his seventies, that "a generation goes, and a generation comes," and that you cannot blame the young too much for considering the poets and artists of the older generation as belonging to the past. He, the poet of youth, or "Sturm und Drang," of passion and hedonism; he, the revolutionary and fighter, the admirer of the titans and the superman, suddenly found himself in his old days somewhat neglected and glossed over, especially by youthful and inconsiderate critics who thought that there was no better way to be revolutionary than to belittle the greats of the near past. In the last years of his life Schneour, who always took pride in his mental and physical prowess, was also beset by ill health. But he bore his sufferings with pride and courage, and to his last day he never bent his head to fate. He departed from this world at seventy-two, still a young lion.

He was born at Shklov, Russia, in 1887, in a family of "Habad" Hassidim and scholars. In his autobiographical memoirs, "My Beginnings As A Writer," Schneour recalls that at the age of seven or eight years he began to write poems in Hebrew and Yiddish. He wrote not only poetry but also prose, fables, and "thoughts." He was fourteen years old when he left home and went to Odessa, which was then a center of Hebrew and Yiddish renaissance literature, and where such young poets as Bialik and Schneour came under the strong influence of Mendele. Two years later Schneour left for another literary center of those days, Warsaw, and published his first Hebrew and Yiddish poems in Olam Katan and in the Yiddishe Folkszeitung. For a while he worked for the Tushia Hebrew Publishing House and later he became J. L. Peretz' private secretary, and also participated in David Frischman's "Hador." Schneour wrote his wonderful poem, "Vilno", in the period of his stay in this city (1904-06).

In the years 1906-07 his first books of poems appeared; the first was "Children's Poems" and the second was "At Sunset." The poet-wanderer Schneour left in 1906 for Western Europe. First he went to Switzerland, where he began his poem, "In the Mountains." From there he went to Paris, where he studied the natural sciences, philosophy, and literature at the Sorbonne University. In 1914 a volume of his poems, written during a period of fourteen years, was published in Odessa. A few years earlier he had published some of his short stories.

The period 1908-1914 was for Schneour rich in wanderings and impressions and blessed in creativity. Some of his best poems were written during this period. World War I found him in Germany, where he was detained as an enemy alien, and only in 1919 did he succeed in reaching the United States. After the war he returned to Europe and settled in Berlin, where he established the publishing house, "Hasefer," together with S. Salzman. Here he published his book of poems, "Bridges" (1922); his poem "Vilno" (1923); his book of short stories, "Bemetzar" (1923); and another book of poems, "Hezionot" (Visions), (1924).

In 1923 he settled in Paris, where he stayed until World War II. In his autobiographical notes Schneour writes with disappointment that he visited Palestine in 1925 and "looked for some material anchor either in the literary field or in some other profession, and had to leave the country with a heavy heart." He then goes on to describe the period of his participation in the Yiddish daily "Forward" of New York, for twenty-two years. There is no doubt that the fact of his participation in this daily contributed in no small degree to the growth of his prose work in Yiddish which number forty volumes.

During the Nazi occupation period of Paris, Schneour's family went through many bitter moments. For one-and-a-half years they had to hide in basements until they succeeded in escaping to Spain and from there to the U.S.A. He arrived penniless in the States, but very soon he settled down and established a fine home, as in Paris. Yet, he did not give up his idea of settling in Israel, and succeeded in realizing this dream nine years ago when he became a citizen of Ramat Gan. After that he considered himself a guest whenever he visited the United States.

Schneour wrote more than sixty volumes of poetry and prose in Hebrew and in Yiddish. He became famous both as a Hebrew poet and Yiddish novelist. Most of his Yiddish novels he reworked into Hebrew and published in Israel during the last ten years. Without any intention of detracting from the importance of his novels or from his talents we must state here that his real greatness was in the field of poetry, and that his talent as a poet found its expression almost exclusively in a mighty and unique form, in the Hebrew language.

We will not analyze here all the reasons nor count all the causative factors, but we will mention a few circumstances which brought this about. It is in the nature of poetry, even stormy and tempestuous poetry, even poetry of epic proportions that its main force is a concentrated one and its words are the quintessence of feeling and thought, both in the short and polished verse and the measured and weighed poem. Not so in prose, where the main role is given to the broad canvas, to the multicolored landscape and the exhaustive description.

Schneour, in whose soul two lived, not without permanent struggle, a poet and a novelist, found the right channel for his poetic talent, for his talent as a poet in Hebrew, and for his talent as a story-teller in Yiddish. True in his later years he made considerable efforts to rework several of Yiddish novels, including "Noah Pandre" and his historical novels like "The Emperor And The Rabbi", into Hebrew, and they were quite a success in Israel. On the other hand, he wrote Yiddish poems, as he had written Hebrew poems in his youth, and from time to time he demonstrated his bilinguality on this score. And yet Schneour remained in the main, in its essence, a Hebrew poet and a Yiddish story-teller with all the consequences of such a double track creativity.

And, again, we do not intend to analyze the causes and the reasons for it. We will only state certain conclusions: Schneour has played an unforgettable role in Hebrew renaissance poetry. He is one of the very great and has fulfilled a historic mission in this field. Schneour, the prose writer, is a story-teller à la Balzac; colorful, with a humor bordering on sarcasm and satire, and psychologically, acute and observing, but his prose cannot compare with his poetic stature. And some of his novels, like "The Emperor And The Rabbi", did not reach the innermost soul and the most important spiritual qualities of their heroes, although even in these novels Schneour charms the reader with all the colors of his palete and with his strong descriptive ability. Let's state, frankly, that Schneour is one of the lions of modern Hebrew poetry, but he is not the king of Yiddish prose and surely not the monarch of Hebrew prose.

Another peculiarity of his prose is that his first short stories, written in Hebrew and published two years after his first poems in 1910, do not reveal the same ripe talent as is manifested in his first poems. There is a certain limitation, a style reminiscent of the dark, pessimistic, and rather awkward story-telling of that time without the broad scope and the lively style and the full colors of his later-day novels. Only in his middle years did Schneour begin to write his ripe prose and won fame with his Shklov novels. But this happened much later, after he had reached his apogee as a poet.

Another peculiarity characteristic of Schneour's prose is that it is mostly a monument to the past, describing Jewish life in the Pale, at the turn of the century, or early in the 19th century, not with an intent to glorify it, or to sing the praise of the "shtetl," but to describe it realistically with a realism bordering on naturalism, and at the same time with a forcefulness and liveliness that gave it symbolic significance. He is in love with the masses, with his, now almost classical, type of Noah Pandre, on one hand, and with the great spiritual personalities like the Vilno Gaon on the other. Yet, at the same time he sees the weaknesses of the "shtetl" and is not loathe to describe them. On the other hand, his poetry is, in the main, poetry of the future or of the legendary past.

His role in Hebrew poetry can hardly be described in one short essay. He began as a revolutionary and a hedonist, a follower of Nietzsche, and as a man who despised the shackles of tradition and conventions. His poems were full of metaphysical struggles and doubts, manifestly groping for a goal and content in life. Nature and landscape were not of great interest to him; he devoted his main attention to the fate of man, of nation, and universe. He described in rather sharp terms the eternal man-woman struggle in the spirit of Otto Weininger's theory. He was the poet of the city, but he was no stranger to nature.

Whatever he had to say he said with force, with vision, and beauty in masterly verse and multi-colored and shining language, original and mighty, full of pathos but at the same time without the slightest banality. This is the reason why each volume of his poems and sometimes a single poem was an event in Hebrew literature in the renaissance epoch. His eroticism had a purely physical character. In this respect he did not change from the time his poem "Pragim" (Poppy-Seed Flowers), the poem which may be termed as a hymn of passions, appeared, and until he wrote "Lucoth Genusim", one of his later poetic works which appeared first in the United States, and was supposed to serve as a mouthpiece for all the hedonistic elements in ancient times, for all the false prophets whose words were not preserved after the biblical traditionalists won a victory over them.

But his over-emphasis of eroticism, as his Nietzscheism, mellowed as time went on, and so changed his almost hateful attitude towards woman in the sense of enmity of the sexes. It was none other than Schneour who exclaimed in the end, "Woman is the golden window to eternity and infinity, and in this is her greatness." Attempts have been made to pigeonhole Schneour as a neo-romantinist, an expressionist, a Schopenhauer pupil, and a Nietzsche-follower. He was each of these things to a degree in certain periods of his creativity, but, in the main, he was himself, Zalman Schneour, a poetic personality, full of contradictions and pain, proud and sarcastic and at the same time soft and lyrical, lonely and bitter, mild and dreamy, egocentrical yet a good comrade.

For Schneour could be a devoted friend, and could be objective if it was a matter with which he was not concerned directly, in a literary or personal way. Regrettably, there were all too many things with which he was concerned in a literary and personal way, and then he could become stormy and cantankerous. But let it be said that even in his moments of ire he never stepped over the boundary of the threatening posture. His bitter attacks and personal animities will be forgotten. His great work will remain.

His fame as a national poet was won very early in life with his "Im Tslilei Hamandolina" (Listening To The Strains Of A Mandolin) where he was one of the first to develop in Chapter II ("Naginot Israel") the theme of bitter enmity to the people of Israel on the part of the external world, based largely, on biological hedonism. To these very days, said Schneour, vengeance is taken on the Jewish people for the victory of monotheism over the old idols . . . They cannot forgive it. The solution is the renaissance of the Jewish people in the lands of their fathers.

Schneour was also one of the first, if not the very first, who foresaw in the prophetic spirit of a great poet, the black clouds of barbarism which began to threaten European Jewry, and he foresaw this before the First World War. In 1913, he wrote a poem called "T'mei Habeinaim Mitkarvim" (The Days Of The Middle Ages Are Approaching). The twenty-six year old poet felt that the dark forces of reaction and anti-Semitism are threatening destruction for the Jewish people; that enlightenment and liberalism are but a passing dream and that the Middle Ages are sure to return as night follows day. He foresaw the beginning of the European holocaust in times of deepest quietude, "Buergerliche Gemuetlichkeit," and superficial peace. He warns the Jewish people, as Bialik warned them in the days of the Nemirov pogrom.

A great national monument is his poem "Vilno." It was written in a lyrical tone and composed in a period of great and stormy events. Schneour tried to give eternal life in his poem to the historical Jewish monuments in the town of Vilno, the Jerusalem of Lithuania, the grave of the Ger Tzedek, the Polish nobleman Count Potocky, who embraced the Jewish religion, the printing press of the widow Rom and other symbols of Jewish spiritual greatness. He gives a striking picture of the invisible struggle between Ostra Brama, the symbol of the ruling Catholic Church, and the center of Jewish learning and scholarship, the house which spreads the light of the Book. "Vilno" is a great lyrical work of rare clarity and depth, and we have a feeling that the poet's eye sees from afar the destruction of "Lithuanian Jerusalem" approaching with slow but sure steps coming some thirty odd years later.

The Russian revolution was one of his early disappointments. He saw in it an awakening of dangerous and negative forces, and warned his people not to participate in this "revolutionary drinking orgy" of the outside world. He also admonishes his people not to forgive the pogrom bands of the Ukrainians who spilled innocent Jewish blood because "the refuge of every wicked man is — forgiveness . . . " In Zion he saw then, as in later years, the real solution and the only answer to all persecution and to all evils of the European nations. His hedonism turns more and more into humanism and deep love for the martyred Jewish people. This makes him forget his earlier theories of superman and titans. It is the spirit of Israel which is destined to fight and conquer idolatry.

"Teacher Of The Year" Has Served Forty Years

From Kiev, to Palestine, to New York, to Miami Beach, Florida, everywhere he has lived in the past forty years, Harry Perach-Kwitney, gifted Jewish teacher, has been serving the cause of Jewish education. As the climax of a lifetime of devotion and accomplishment in transmitting the Jewish heritage, Mr. Perach was recently designated the "Teacher of the Year" for the Jewish religious schools of America, the first time any one has been so honored.

Mr. Perach, a member of the faculty of the Hebrew Academy of Miami Beach for the past decade, was singled out for the unusual citation from a field of approximately 17,500 teachers serving in the nation's Jewish schools. He was chosen "Teacher of the Year" to dramatize the first annual observance of "Teacher's Day," a new communal event in American Jewish life proclaimed by the American Association for Jewish Education for the purpose of focussing public attention on the role of teachers and educators in the nation's Jewish religious schools. "Teacher's Day" was celebrated around the country in conjunction with the Lag B'Omer Festival (Arbor Day).

The announcement of Mr. Perach's selection took place at a public dinner held in New York to mark the 20th anniversary of the founding of the American Association for Jewish Education. More than 650 delegates from all sections of the country, teachers, educators, presidents, and directors of local Bureaus of Jewish Education, Jewish community leaders, witnessed a dramatized biography of the Miami Beach teacher in which colleagues and former pupils participated. Mr. Perach's career began 40 years ago in Kiev, Russia, when as a young man of 22, he helped to organize Hebrew schools in that city and throughout the Ukraine. While teaching there he met and later married one of his students.

In 1922, with a group of 260 pioneers, he left Russia for Palestine, where he joined the vanguard of the defense units organized to protect the Jewish settlements. The following year he migrated to the U.S. Within a short time he founded the Yeshiva of the Bronx, later known as the Yeshiva Israel Salanter, the first Jewish school to teach all subjects in Hebrew and to be guided by modern pedagogic principles. He taught there from 1923 to 1948, and in addition, he managed to teach also at the Marshallish High School, the Tremont Talmud Torah, and the Washington Heights Talmud Torah, all in New York.

In 1949, at the invitation of its then-president, David S. Andron, Mr. Perach joined the faculty of the Hebrew Academy of Miami Beach, where he has remained since. The school is the first Hebrew Day School in the South. Mr. Perach's former students include a number of rabbis, educators, and outstanding personalities in various walks of life. Among them are the novelist Herman Wouk; Dr. Gerson Cohen, a member of the faculty of the Jewish Theological Seminary of America; Alfred Weisel, president of the Educators Assembly of America; and Dr. Jacob Kabakoff, Dean, of the Cleveland Institute of Jewish Studies.

The tribute to Mr. Perach comes after a long and distinguished career in the service of the Jewish people. In a larger sense, his designation as "Teacher of the Year" honors many thousands of men and women across the nation, the teachers of America's Jewish religious schools, who have pledged themselves to the survival of Judaism through the inculcation of Jewish learning.

WHOLE CONGREGATION IS MOVING

Suppose some of the families lived on top floors of tall apartments? They could not even use the elevators.

Men of the Chasidic Jews do not shave their beards. They wear black felt gowns and black broad-brimmed hats. The boys have small embroidered skull caps. The women wear gray dresses and kerchiefs on their heads. The people use English only in talking to outsiders. They speak Yiddish at home and Hebrew in the synagogue — the two main ones are at 500 and 550 Bedford Avenue.

The first families hope to be able to move to the new home late next year. Right now, the congregation is negotiating for aid in Federal housing funds. Many of the men work in the garment section in Manhattan. They plan to commute by chartered bus, says the New York Herald Tribune. Others own small businesses and hope to take them along to Jersey.

Present Day Problems Of Aging: A Challenge

BY DR. E. DAVID SHERMAN, F.A.C.P.,
CO-PHYSICIAN-IN-CHIEF, MONTREAL HEBREW OLD PEOPLE'S AND SHELTERING HOME

The three aspects of old age of grave concern to the individual and needing support are maintenance of income, maintenance of health, and maintenance of social adjustments.

Maintenance of income is probably the major factor of concern for the aged, and the magnitude of the economic problems of old age can hardly be over-emphasized. Provisions for continued or new employment are probably necessary for a solution. Compulsory retirement at the arbitrary age of 65 years is illogical as no consideration is given to the personal desires and psychological and social needs of the person and no regard is given to his productive capacity. Selective retirement is now being advocated, but the ability to measure the continued capacity to work at older ages is sadly lacking.

No person without better means than now exist should ever be allowed to be placed by industrial employers in the position of being judge and arbitrator in decisions concerning employee retirement. Until other objective criteria are developed, chronological age is the only basis for impartial decisions. Research in this area is sadly lacking, and industry and labor could make a major contribution by using active adults in industry as subjects. Perhaps there is need for a flexible wage and hour structure and a classification of jobs on the basis of their "stress" value so they can be adjusted to the individual needs and capacities of the older worker. Most men need to, and would probably prefer, to continue working after 65.

By tradition, the U.S.A. has always endeavored to give financial aid to the aged. Beginning in Colonial days with the poor relief, the government has been taking increasing responsibility for supplying the aged with minimum income for a decent existence. The poor relief system was inadequate, poorly administered, and always carried with it a stigma. With the adoption of the Social Security Act in 1935, old age assistance came into operation. In recent years this plan has also been adopted in Canada.

Industrial pension systems which are growing rapidly in recent times, can be looked for to supplement Social Security payments. However, industrial pension schemes require much study. Many are not sound actuarily, are not funded, and are too restrictive on basis of years service by the employee, and do not allow vesting of accrued rights.

Small companies have found pension plans practical only when carried through insurance companies, using the broad facilities of the latter for investment, actuarial and administrative experience and service. Gaps between social security and industrial pensions must be met by individual initiative and savings. In spite of all plans, governmental, industrial, and personal, at present continued employment over 65 years is still necessary to the total financing of this growing segment of our population.

Coupled with maintenance of income, the elderly person is concerned about his physical and mental health. Carlson stated: "We are not yet in a position to determine with the certainty of science to what degree the changes in the machinery of the body, which parallel advancing age, are due to the genetic constitution of the individual and the species, that is, the aging process in itself, and how much is due to the accidents of life, such as faulty diet, infection, over-work, laziness, or gluttony."

Intensive research on the many unknowns in aging processes will some day enable science to delay greatly this involution. There are still lacking basic functional studies on the middle-aged and elderly. Research is beginning with more extensive study of the chronic progressive disorders of later maturity, such as heart disease, high blood pressure, arthritis, hardening of the arteries, etc.

Projects with "multiple screenings" of normal subjects with a battery of tests have been set up by the U.S. Public Health Service in the attempt to evaluate them in the prevention of chronic disease. Many industries are utilizing executive examinations as an evaluation and preventive program. Progress will necessarily be slow and probably awaits more refined chemical measurements than are now available.

A concomitant problem is the incidence of chronic disease in the aging. The Commission on Chronic Illness in the U.S.A. has pointed out that 40% of the total number of chronic disease are 65 years old and over. The rate of prevalence of disabling illness is 13 times as frequent among persons 65 and over as among persons under age 45, and three times as frequent as among persons in the 45-64 age group.

Stieglitz has advocated "constructive medicine", which is defined as the construction of greater health in those relatively well. This is performed through a periodic health inventory and consultation, with advice as to specific defects in health and the hygiene of living. He strongly feels that this regimen should be initiated in the middle-aged as well as the elderly.

Among the newer programs for the elderly has been the inauguration of Geriatric-Clinics at General Hospitals, to effectuate a comprehensive program for team health care of the ambulatory aged through co-ordination of all existing facilities within the Hospital. It is important to include co-ordinating procedures with community agencies so that services from both the hospital and these other facilities could be brought together to ensure a maximum of needed service. This integrated program in out-patient care is essential to develop research with a view to learning more about the aging process and its implications, as well as prevention and treatment.

The chronically ill patients are treated at Hospitals with chronic disease divisions or special hospitals for chronic disease. Adequate care of the long-term patient requires arrangements which promote frequent evaluation of patient needs and easy flow back and forth among home, hospital, and related institutions. Rehabilitation is an innate element of adequate care and properly begins with diagnosis. It is applicable alike to persons who may become employable and to those whose only realistic hope may be a higher level of self-care. Coordination and integration of services and facilities in the community are so valuable in promoting good care for the chronically ill.

An extremely important medical and social development is the extension of a home-care program. Since the number of handicapped is increasing far faster than institutional beds can be built, it is clear that they must be taken care of at home. In fact, only a small percentage of the aged are actually in institutions. This program includes services such as physicians' care, visiting nurses, housekeeper service, social workers, etc. Above all this program ensures security of family environment. It is interesting to note that a study of one group of aged so-called chronic patients in New York City revealed that nearly 90% did not require hospital care.

Preparation for senescence through education has not kept pace with the changing social order. College and school curricula are still geared to the day when life expectancy was more than 15 years less than it is today, when it sufficed that education attempt only preparation of the boy or girl for the completion of early maturity. There is beginning evidence that educators are aware of the need for preparation for senescence.

The false and completely smug assumption that the art of aging is learned spontaneously has grievously retarded development of the potentialities of the elderly. The child prepares to become an adult; the adult must likewise prepare for senescence if old age is not to be crabbed or bitter. Happy, full, significantly useful lives are not fortuitous. They are predetermined by preparation. The time is approaching when schools should review their objectives and recognize their obligations in the latter years of life.

Greatness of mind in later years comes from continued study. This is rarely encouraged among adults, with the notable exception of professional groups. Professionals who become great continue to study, exercise conscious effort to learn. Facilities for adult education are grossly inadequate. Personnel is uninspired and untrained to meet the special problems of pedagogy for adult minds.

Many years of repetition of an incorrect dictum eventually leads to its adoption as truth. The woefully erroneous concept that the older mind cannot learn has done immeasurable harm. Constant reiteration of such platitudes as: "You can't teach an old dog new tricks" has so fixed this false statement in the minds of most aging people that they are afraid to try to learn.

That the concept is false has been proven repeatedly by the studies of Miles, Thorndike, and others. These investigators demonstrated that the ability to learn depreciates very slowly if the will to learn is retained. Miles has pointed out that the increments of knowledge accumulated through the years and the continued practice of mental exercise favor preservation of mental abilities. Critical judgment is enhanced by aging; superficiality and the gloss of pretty phraseology used to conceal ignorance are quickly discerned by the adult mind. In order to teach the old dog new tricks, it is necessary to know more than the dog.

Aging is asymmetrical. As certain physical and psychic attributes decline with age, others become stronger. Memory may decline, but judgment in the appraisal of the significance of the facts improves with age. Visual acuity obviously diminishes but the ability to comprehend that which is seen improves with experience. Experience is dependent on time and therefore inevitably grows with age. The intelligence, as measured by the Bellevue scale, declines very slowly indeed in later years; in some respects qualitative changes compensate for the quantitative depreciation. Many factors, such as motivation, interest, practice or disease, alter and distort the quantitative studies on those in later maturity.

and not in machines; it is in a better society," says the New York Times. The task before the nation, he continued, "is to find an essential unity and zest for learning in the American people as a whole — to discover and develop new potentials."

it went badly. The Selwyns bought it back and produced it in New York and made a big success.

In association with his brother Mr. Selwyn produced a long succession of hits from 1914 to 1926, including "Fair and Warmer" and "Smilin' Through." In later years, with Noël Coward, he produced such hits as "Private Lives" and "Bitter-sweet."

In the course of his career Mr. Selwyn induced Mrs. Leslie Carter to return to the stage from retirement, gave Madge Kennedy and Tallulah Bankhead their first important theatrical opportunities and brought Mr. Coward, Diana Wynyard, Beatrice Lillie, Gertrude Lawrence, and Jack Buchanan to Broadway.

In 1916, Mr. Selwyn, his brother Edgar and Samuel Goldfish organized the Goldwyn Film Company, afterward sold to Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. The corporate name was derived from the combination of their names. Later, after the brothers left the company to devote themselves exclusively to the legitimate stage, Mr. Goldfish adopted the company name as his own. Mr. Selwyn built three theatres on New York's Forty-second Street: The Selwyn, the Apollo, and the Times Square, and two in Chicago; the Selwyn and the Harris. Mr. Selwyn was divorced in 1943 from Mrs. Viola A. Selwyn after thirty-four years of marriage.

Leon D. Crestohl, Q.C., M.P., 1735 Ducharme Avenue, Montreal, and Israel Chertkow, of Saskatoon, have been elected officers of the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University. Allan Bronfman is national president of the organization. Mr. Crestohl, who was elected to the Friends' national council, has been associated with the national committee on endowments and bequests and was a member of its Law School building national campaign council. Mr. Chertkow, who was elected to the national executive, is the secretary-treasurer of the Saskatoon Chapter and the membership chairman for Northern Saskatchewan.
